JUDICIAL REFORM

JUDICIAL INTEGRITY: PRINCIPLES, STRATEGY AND IMPLEMENTATION

THE HON. MICHAEL KIRBY AC CMG***

BANGALORE PRINCIPLES OF JUDICIAL INTEGRITY

One of the main developments in judicial reform, happening throughout the world, is the attempt to improve and measure judicial integrity<sup>1</sup>. In developing countries and in the newly independent states of Central and Eastern Europe, integrity based judicial reform programmes are gathering pace:

“Responding to a call made by the United Nations in 2006, nearly every country on every continent is in the process of requiring their judges to establish their accountability to certain core judicial values ....”

These judicial values appear in several human rights instruments of the United Nations, starting with Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), proclaimed by the General Assembly on 10 December 1948:

“Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him.”

The principles stated in the UDHR are reaffirmed and elaborated in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR). By Article 14.1 of that Covenant it is declared:

1. Nihal Jayawickrama, “The Politicisation of the Sri Lankan Judiciary”, published in Sunday Leader, 24 July 2011, Colombo, Leader Publications Pvt, Ltd., 14.

“All persons shall be equal before the courts and tribunals. In the determination of any criminal charge against him, or of his rights and obligations in a suit at law, everyone shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law”

Two concepts have been added by the ICCPR:

- (1) The requirement that the tribunal must be “competent”; and
- (2) That it must be “established by law”, not created ad hoc at the whim of other powers.

Over the years, several United Nations agencies and conferences have returned to the basic principles stated in the UDHR and ICCPR. In this way, United Nations organs have created further basic principles on the independence of the judiciary, designed to uphold and assure the independence of courts and other essential qualities of justice and the rule of law. These principles include the United Nations Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, adopted in September 1985 and endorsed by the General Assembly in November of that year; and more recently the Bangalore Principles of Judicial Conduct, adopted by the Judicial Integrity Group (JIG), working under the supportive aegis of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC).

The Bangalore Principles have been the principal focus of many global and regional meetings of judges, including the regional workshop held in Jakarta in January 2011. Since the establishment of the JIG in 2000, I have served as Rapporteur of the Group. Its principles have increasingly been accepted by the judiciary around the world, and by international agencies, as an excellent statement and elaboration of the core principles by which the judiciary should perform its functions and fulfil its obligations.

The Bangalore Principles, named after the city in India where they were endorsed in 2001, identify six essential values and proceed to explain and elaborate these, giving guidance as to how they will be carried into effect.<sup>2</sup>

The values are:

- (1) Independence;
- (2) Impartiality;
- (3) Integrity;
- (4) Propriety;
- (5) Equality; and
- (6) Competence and Diligence.

In developing the Bangalore Principles, the JIG consulted widely with judges of the major legal traditions of the world, specifically judges from the common law and the civil law traditions.

Gathered at the Jakarta regional workshop, were distinguished judges of the Supreme Court of Indonesia and of other courts in the Indonesian hierarchy who were co-hosts of the meeting. In addition, there were present participants from other countries, notably Germany (a major sponsor), Australia, and East Timor, The Netherlands, European Union, ASEAN and officers of a number of embassies based in Jakarta. Judges or other officials were present from these countries, as well as Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Cambodia, Japan, Laos, Malaysia, Mongolia, Myanmar/Burma, Nepal, The Philippines, Singapore, Sri Lanka and Thailand. The JIG was represented by Judge Rudolf Mellinghoff (Germany), Dr Nihal Jayawickrama (JIG Co-ordinator) and me. Much of the work in Jakarta was devoted to examining the Bangalore Principles and considering them in the context of the attributes of law and justice within the Asia/Pacific region. The present comments represent a summing up of some of the main points to emerge in the course of the workshop.

JUDICIARY IN THE ASIA/PACIFIC REGION

Positive Features: A number of positive features, tending to support the moves to enhanced judicial integrity in the region, were noted by the participants:

- (1) Economic Growth: The growth of the economies, especially in Asia and particularly in South Asia, has defied expectations and differentiated the region from the serious economic consequences of the ongoing global financial crisis as it is affecting Europe and North America. In the context of still robust economic growth in Asia, the strengthening and improvement of the judiciary is important, given that it contributes, in a marked way, to secure economic growth.

- (2) Populations: Within Asia, there are strong historical and cultural traditions of hard work and resilience, often in the face of adversity. These features of culture and growing levels of school and tertiary education, raise expectations of integrity in all branches of government, including the judiciary.
- (3) Judiciary: At the same time, the standards of the judiciary have been raised, conformably with the regularisation of systems of judicial appointment; increased requirements of educational and vocational attainments; and improved facilities for continuing judicial education. The exposure of judges in the region to members of foreign judiciaries, with long traditions of integrity, has also fired the imagination of many judges in the region. The attempts in the Peoples Republic of China to build a rule of law observant judiciary has accompanied the requirements of economic growth and the expectations of China's trading partners of efficient and predictable outcomes to commercial disputes. Although still far from perfect, the endeavour to build a respected judiciary in China is an historic development important for the whole Asia/Pacific region. Not by accident were the earlier principles of judicial independence for the region adopted in Beijing at a regional meeting of chief justices.<sup>3</sup>
- (4) National Endorsement: The Bangalore Principles have been endorsed by several countries in the region. Specifically, The Philippines, encouraged by former Chief Justice H. Davide (then a member of the JIG) adopted the Bangalore Principles for observance by the judiciary of that country. Attention has been given to the Bangalore Principles by judicial authorities in other lands, including Indonesia.
- (5) Australian Developments: In Australia, increasingly engaging with the countries of its geographic region, several developments are worth noting. The nation's highest court (the High Court of Australia) is participating in the Asia/Pacific Judicial Forum and Justice Kenneth Hayne of that Court is currently the Chairman of the Forum. Coinciding with the publication of the Bangalore Principles, the Council of Chief Justices of Australia approved the publication by the Australian Institute of Judicial Administration of a Guide to Judicial Conduct.<sup>4</sup> It reflects many of the same principles and applications as expressed in the Bangalore Principles. It also draws on earlier publications by the Canadian Judicial Council.<sup>5</sup> These developments indicate the sharing amongst judicial bodies of developments happening elsewhere. Additionally, in Australia, for the first time, permanent institutions have been created to organise regular courses in judicial education. In New South Wales, the most populous state, a Judicial Commission was created in 1986<sup>6</sup>, evidencing a move away from wholly informal and internal arrangements for handling complaints against judges and providing, in more detail, for accountability and discipline. Mr E.J. Schmatt, Chief Executive of the Commission, participated in the workshop and described some of its activities.

Negative features: As against these positive developments in the region, a few negative considerations were noted:

- (1) Colonial Relics: Most of the countries in the region went through a colonial experience in which outside rulers imposed their laws, sometimes introducing alien and oppressive arrangements, many of which have been preserved by post-colonial governments. These include, in several jurisdictions of the region, the colonial criminal laws relating to consensual adult sexual activity, which impede the successful strategies to fight HIV/AIDS, that is prevalent in the region.<sup>7</sup> But they also include exceptional emergency laws, which effectively place some conduct of executive government outside the supervision of the courts, undermining compliance with universal human rights.

- (2) Governmental Interference: In a number of jurisdictions, well known instances of alleged or established governmental interference in the independence of the judiciary stand as a warning of the fragility of the separation of governmental powers and the need to assure the judges against governmental intrusion. The existence of such intrusion in Indonesia was reported by the International Commission of Jurists during the Soeharto regime<sup>8</sup>. In Malaysia, the removal of the Lord President of the Federal Court (Tun Salleh Abas) from his office was widely condemned, including by the first Prime Minister of the country, Tunku Abdul Rahman<sup>9</sup>. Constitutions and words on paper cannot provide a total assurance against events of this kind. A culture of constitutionalism must be created. And the judiciary has a vital role to play which can only be fulfilled if the judges enjoy tenure, independence and integrity<sup>10</sup>.
- (3) Legal Reform: A constant problem of developing countries is the inability to ensure the speedy and effective reform of the law, so as to remove the risks and opportunities of corruption, designed to cut corners and to overcome or circumvent legal inefficiencies and impediments. Although law reform agencies and other such institutions, including within the legislatures, have been created in the region, typically they are poorly funded, small and relatively ineffective. Unless the law is updated, the temptations of powerful interests to get around its provisions constitute an important institutional impediment to judicial integrity.
- (4) Salaries and Corruption Allegations: In most countries of the region, the judiciary is seriously under-remunerated. Often judicial salaries are pegged by reference to relativities with military and administrative officers. Yet there are special reasons why judicial salaries must place judicial officers beyond the risks of temptation. When, between 1993-6 I served as Special Representative of the Secretary General for Human Rights in Cambodia, I endeavoured to persuade described it as “the most shocking story in modern and judicial history”

the World Bank to this opinion. Without success. Cambodian judges at that time were paid little more than $US20 per month. Although things have improved and the World Bank has come to appreciate the essential need to create a judicial infrastructure of manifest integrity and strength to defend so much else in each country, the challenge of ensuring proper judicial salaries is a near universal one.

- (5) Judicial Example: Unfortunately, cases exist where judges themselves have acted in ways that are prone to appear to ordinary citizens as lacking in the proper standards of integrity. Yet citizens in the region frequently have no remedy, nor the resources, to respond to such instances. It will suffice to make reference to recent well known instances in a non-Asia/Pacific country, the United States of America. There senior Justices of the Supreme Court have refused to recuse themselves from participating in the determination of closely contested cases, where they have significant engagement with one side of the record. Instances involving Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas have led to a call from more than 100 law professors across the United States for the US Congress to extend an ethical code of conduct, applied in other federal courts, to the Supreme Court, so as to eliminate or reduce repetitions of such unsettling circumstances<sup>11</sup>. So far, the Supreme Court has resisted such a move. Ironically, the separation of powers principle itself may constitutionally limit the power of the legislators to enact detailed laws on this subject.

VALUE OF DIALOGUE

Given the unique and peculiar circumstances of each country when it comes to the judiciary, and the complex of cultural, historical, economic, religious and other forces that impinge upon the values that influence judicial activity, some might doubt the value of regional workshops addressed to the theme of judicial integrity. However, in response to any such doubts, there are a number of words that can be said, if the Jakarta workshop affords any guide:

- (1) Learning from each other: Without in any way surrendering the independence of each national court system, and its duty to conform to its own national constitutional and legal requirements, there are sufficient analogies and similarities in the judiciary across borders to ensure that the exchange of views and of experiences will be of value in formulating and implementing the principles of judicial integrity in one's own country. This is why regional workshops are especially valuable because geographical propinquity will often connote cultural similarity and similar institutional responses to common problems.
- (2) Accepting Adversity: None the less, inevitably, there will be differences in the ways in which particular countries address similar or even identical problems of judicial conduct. Pragmatic economic and other forces will influence the way judges look at problems and resolve them. In the case of the JIG, it has revealed that significantly different approaches to the disclosure of financial interests of family members of a judge were found to exist in civil and common law countries. Likewise, the question whether a judge could, after appointment, maintain contact with political parties, was another element in respect of which different legal traditions offer different opinions.<sup>12</sup>
- (3) Differing Priorities: In different jurisdictions, different priorities will emerge, so far as judicial integrity is concerned. In some, actual corruption by the payment of money or the promise of favours will represent an immediate and urgent challenge that will require attention. In other countries, the problems for judicial integrity will involve no monetary corruption or improper influence: yet the infractions may be more subtle and in some ways more insidious.<sup>13</sup>
- (4) Corruption Convention: The adoption by the international community of the United Nations Convention against Corruption, with UNODC as its guardian, provides a special occasion for implementation of the Bangalore Principles.

Although judicial corruption is not the only form of corrupt conduct that undermines integrity in a given society, it is an important form of corruption. The role of the Bangalore Principles and of the JIG may therefore be significant in advancing the practical implementation of the Convention, specifically in respect of various forms of judicial corruption and lack of integrity. It is for this reason that it is important for the judiciary in every country to consider the principles propounded by the JIG and to measure local practice, legal and institutional responses and attitudes against the gold standard of the Bangalore Principles and the commentary offered by the JIG as to how those principles should be interpreted and applied in practice.

- (5) Publicisation and Promotion: If the Bangalore Principles of the JIG are accepted and found useful in the foregoing respects, it will be important to promote knowledge of them, particularly in the judiciary throughout the world. It will also be necessary to collect instances where the Bangalore Principles have been applied by municipal courts<sup>14</sup> or by judicial disciplinary bodies and administrators. It will also be essential to consider the way in which the JIG itself is constituted, its membership appointed and renewed, and elaborations of its principles collected, and commented upon. Additionally, it will be essential for the JIG to reflect and report upon the ways the Bangalore Principles can be measured and audited, in their application in individual countries. Should this, for instance, be done by way of an Integrity Index, akin to the Corruption Index published annually by Transparency International? Alternatively, as may be more appropriate in the first instance, should a check list for self assessment by nation states be instituted to promote constructive and positive participation of states and other stakeholders in a way that might not occur if a contestable Index were determined by outsiders, without scrutiny and endorsement by the states themselves.

These and other questions were discussed in the meetings and in the margins of the Jakarta workshop. However many of the interventions by the participants were addressed to the principles, strategies, and implementation measures designed to promote integrity in the judiciary.

I now turn to illustrations of the commentaries that were made upon these.

SUGGESTION ON THE PRINCIPLES

The following are some of the suggestions that were made in respect of the Bangalore Principles, following their examination by the Jakarta workshop:

- (1) A number of the judicial participants emphasised the importance of lifting the perception of the problem from simple monetary corruption to the wider issues of integrity dealt with by the JIG. This idea was expressed by one judge from Thailand in terms that “integrity is not just honesty”. Thus, it is necessary to recognise that honesty on the part of judges is essential; but it is insufficient for the attainment of integrity.
- (2) Likewise, several participants stressed that the value of independence includes, as the JIG itself has emphasised, independence from other judges in substantive decision making, including within multi member courts.
- (3) Judge Mellinghoff instanced the need to recognise that the assignment of cases or of work within the courts, to members of the judiciary, is an attribute of judicial independence. This is a notion that has been affirmed recently by the High Court of Australia and can sometimes be overlooked by executive government.<sup>15</sup> If parties or governments can effectively choose their judges, they can hope to influence the outcomes of cases. Judge Mellinghoff also described the importance of providing judges with appropriate immunity from suit and tenure for the performance of their judicial duties, whilst at the same time affording appropriate remedies to litigants for fraudulent, criminal or seriously incompetent judicial conduct.
- (4) A participant from The Philippines emphasised the importance of appreciating the relevance for judicial integrity of chronic underfunding of the courts, including court budgets and judicial salaries.

- (5) The German Ambassador, in his opening remarks to the Jakarta workshop, urged that the judicial integrity principles should be placed in the context of both universal human rights principles and the United Nations Convention Against Corruption, Article 11. As well, the economic self interest of countries for supporting and obtaining judicial integrity, needed to be emphasised and appreciated.
- (6) Dr Jayawickrama gave instances of the way in which judicial transfers could be misused to deal inadequately with alleged problems of judicial integrity; but could also themselves sometimes amount to breaches of the principles of integrity so as to punish good judicial officers and not to punish the bad. The desirability of addressing the problem of preferential treatment of judicial officers was stressed.
- (7) In my own remarks, I suggested that more work needed to be done (including in the Asia/Pacific region) concerning the differences that exist in conceptions of judicial integrity prevailing in common law and civil law countries. These differences already referred to by the JIG, emphasise the need for a degree of generality in the expression of the principles. And also flexibility in the way in which those principles are applied in differing legal environments.

OBSERVATIONS ON STRATEGY

A number of important reflections were offered concerning the strategies that need to be adopted in giving effect to the Bangalore Principles in different jurisdictions:

- (1) Thus, the Deputy Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Indonesia recognised that judicial integrity is a sensitive topic where there is sometimes a need to balance competing principles. An example given was the potential clash between notions of judicial independence and the responses to allegations of incompetence and lack of diligence.
- (2) The German Ambassador mentioned the desirability of taking advantage of regional treaties and interests. Thus the ASEAN Human Rights Commission could be informed and invited to be engaged in regional elaborations of the Bangalore Principles. The more this was done, the greater might be the chance of securing the co-operation of all branches of government and the realisation of the importance of judicial integrity for the people, the nation and the region (a point made by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Indonesia).

- (3) A participant from Malaysia suggested the desirability of listing the growing number of countries, including in the region, with new codes of conduct that had been influenced by the Bangalore Principles. Such countries now include the judiciary in Malaysia, The Philippines and Singapore.
- (4) Where a new national judicial code has been adopted, it would be desirable that the JIG or a regional body should measure the provisions of the code against the Bangalore Principles and draw inconsistencies to the notice of the judiciary concerned. This would give the judges the opportunity to consider bringing their code into line with the international standard.
- (5) A judge from Myanmar/Burma emphasised the special opportunities afforded by ready made international standards for his country and others during a process of democratic transition. This might occasion a particular engagement with such a country, so as to maximise the impact of integrity principles at a sensitive time.
- (6) Judicial education must be part of the ongoing strategy of the JIG. Simply publishing guidelines does not ensure their implementation. It must be supplemented by follow up and instruction. The JIG must go beyond documents and take responsibility for application and implementation, including through accessibility on the internet and the provision of local material translated into major regional languages. This was a point made by several participants. The lack of an authorised translation of the Bangalore Principles in the Bahasa Indonesia language was specially noted.
- (7) The possible need for UNODC to draw the work of the JIG and of the Bangalore Principles to the notice of the states parties which have already subscribed to the United Nations Convention against Corruption was mentioned by several participants, including from UNODC and UNDP.

- (8) Judge Mellinghoff proposed that the JIG should consider a strategy of auditing or monitoring judicial integrity so as to ensure that the principles and recommendations advocated by the JIG make an actual difference on the ground in the countries affected.
- (9) Several participants suggested the holding of more regional meetings, or missions to individual countries, on the basis that this was the most valuable way of involving the judiciary and engaging its support for the Bangalore Principles and their implementation.
- (10) The number of participants recommended the distribution of email contacts of willing participants, so that networking of those who had participated in the regional workshop could continue after its conclusion.
- (11) Judge Vreese of The Netherlands urged that the JIG should bring its commentary on the Bangalore Principles up to date with reference to developments that have occurred since 2003, including the Declaration by the International Association of Judges; the principles of integrity adopted by the United Nations Appeals Tribunal; and the recent IBA principles on the election of United Nations Judges, adopted in Dubai in 2011.
- (12) The participant from Tempo urged the judges to consider the use of social media, including Facebook and Twitter, as an efficient means of getting the word out to the very large numbers of judicial officers and lawyers who use these networks, including in Indonesia.
- (13) Some participants suggested the renaming of the Bangalore Principles, given the recent decision of the City of Bangalore to adopt a different name. This proposal was contested, as was a consequential suggestion by the writer that the word “Bangalore” should be dropped to avoid confusion with an earlier statement of Bangalore Principles.<sup>16</sup>

OBSERVATIONS ON IMPLEMENTATION

During the course of the Jakarta workshop many observations were made on ways of increasing and improving the rate of implementation of the Bangalore Principles in the Asia/Pacific region:

- (1) Mr R. Sudarshan (UNDP Asia/Pacific Regional Centre) raised the possibility of adopting a Judicial Integrity Index (JII) akin to the UNDP Development Index.
- (2) Mr Ajit Joy (UNODC) suggested that participating states might consider the utility of adopting an integrity implementation commission, as had been done in Indonesia. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Indonesia, in similar vein, urged the importance of involving the judiciary themselves in the discipline of judges; and of engaging young and new judges in the challenge of discipline and integrity.
- (3) One participant recommended the need to institute a regular declaration by judicial officers of their personal assets. There was discussion concerning whether publicity should attach to any such a declaration.
- (4) Several participants proposed the establishment of Academies of Law or, where they already existed, that they should include, amongst their activities, research into integrity codes.
- (5) Several judges emphasised the importance of timeliness in dealing with allegations of departures from judicial integrity. Systems should be in place to check and assure timeliness of decisions in this area.
- (6) In civil law countries the importance of integrity in the conduct of competitive exams for admission to the profession of judging raises important issues of integrity; as do the procedures for appointments for judges from the private practicing profession, in countries that follow the common law tradition.

- (7) Many participants stressed the importance of ongoing education for the judiciary in the principles of integrity.
- (8) Judge Mellinghoff described the difficulties that can arise for the orders made by a judge found to be corrupt and possibly removed from office. Are all that judge's orders immediately suspect and should some procedure be adopted to permit their review? Should such orders be automatically suspended, as tainted by a finding of judicial corruption or want of integrity?
- (9) The need for an efficient system for appeal and review against disciplinary decisions was raised by a number of participants; as was the need for care in the provision of advisory opinions having consequences for judicial integrity.
- (10) Several participants emphasised the need to recognise and appreciate the special role of civil society organisations and 'whistleblowers' in the practical implementation of any strategy to defend the integrity of the judiciary.
- (11) The need to ensure that integrity machinery is open to the new technologies now available, such as electronic filing, texting and statistical analysis, was repeatedly referred to.
- (12) Judge of Appeal Chao of Singapore emphasised the need to build up a momentum for systemic change in the judiciary, as a consequence of individual instances of alleged error or lack of integrity. The possibility of establishing an ethics committee to guide judges in advance of problems arising was explored. So was the role of individual appellate decisions as laying down broad principles for the operation of integrity rules.<sup>17</sup> Some thought needed to be given to strategies to secure, manage and maintain good talent in the judiciary. Not all issues of integrity need to be negative.
- (13) The differential involvement of the legislature in ultimate decisions on judicial integrity, typical of countries of the common law, was explored and recent experience in Australia described where a State legislature had shown indulgence to judicial officers evidencing behavioural problems. So was the creation of a judicial commentator to be available to the media, as in The Netherlands, so as to ensure accuracy and proportionality in the media reportage of judicial cases and problems.

<sup>17</sup> An Instance given in discussion was the decision of the Court of Appeal in Singapore in the case of Thong Ah Fat v Public Prosecutor (2011).

OUTSTANDING PRESENTATIONS

The participants in the Jakarta conference were privileged to see and hear a number of outstanding presentations on the issues of judicial integrity:

- (1) The best PowerPoint presentation was given by judges from Thailand, whose command of interactive media is sorely needed in the creation and maintenance of an attractive website by the JIG.
- (2) The most surprising participation was by the Hon. Sein Than, a judge from Myanmar/Burma, a country whose judiciary has largely been cut off from colleagues in the region for several decades.
- (3) A most courageous participant was Judge Abdul Salam Asimi, Chief Justice of Afghanistan. His exposure to daily risks and dangers is a reflection of the circumstances in which judges often operate in several parts of the world.
- (4) The most philosophical contribution was given by Chief Justice Harifin Tumpa of Indonesia and by the German Ambassador (H.E. Mr Norbert Baas). They put the issues of judicial integrity in a context of governmental efficiency and acceptability to the citizens, who are the ultimate judges of those who perform judicial duties.
- (5) The most upsetting contribution as given by Justice Chao of Singapore, who explained the proposal for the reduction of the salaries of the judges of Singapore, who are amongst the highest paid judges in the world. Judges from throughout the region look at the salaries paid in Singapore with envy and watch with concern of the possibility of their reduction, said to be because of the current financial crisis.

- (6) The most realistic question of the workshop was asked by Judge Adriana Nurdin of Indonesia, who explored the salary, working conditions and practical facilities available to judges in different countries. These practical incidents of the performance of judicial office were likely to be influential in responses to challenges and needs of judicial integrity.
- (7) The most naughty intervention of the workshop were made by a mobile phones which occasionally punctured the quiet reflection with their urgent calls for immediate attention.
- (8) The most musical intervention was the responsibility of Ajit Roy, an organiser of the conference, who arranged the cultural event and musical interlude. It taught the participants that the gentle Balinese music of Indonesia is not the only genre. By analogy, it taught the variety of judicial life in the region and the world.
- (9) The promptest response to any proposal at the workshop was achieved by the JIG itself. No sooner had participants called for the JIG to ensure that its website was accessible online but it was up and running and available to all comers. It may be hoped that this will stimulate the availability of the JIG's work and the Bangalore Principles throughout the region and the world.
- (10) The most brilliant rapporteurs of the workshop were Mr Samuel de Jaggere and Mr R. Sudarshan (UNDP) who combined accuracy, incisiveness and sensitivity with a report that was focused on follow up and future action.

It can be expected that there will be further workshops in the Asia/Pacific region addressed to issues of judicial integrity. The support of the host country and of its courts and judges is essential for the success of such meetings. So is the financial support given by embassies and overseas foundations. The participants recorded their special thanks to the German Government and GIZ for facilitating the workshop and contributing greatly to its success. There will be further such meetings. And they will serve the causes of judicial integrity, without which the promises of peace and security, economic equity and universal human rights in the Charter of the United Nations will be unfulfilled.
